White Out

2

Spike and Lady were out for a short run in the woods. But Spike ran faster and farther than he ever had before. The crisp winter air gave him lots of energy. Spike was the best runner. Unlike Spike, Lady lumbered along the path and nosed around evergreen shrubs and underbrush.

Neither dog paid any attention to the darkening sky or the first flakes of snow. After an hour of fun, the dogs were tired. Both curled up under some prickly bushes on a warm, spongy bed of newly fallen leaves.

By the time the dogs woke up, the snow had been falling steadily all afternoon. Drifts hid the trails, and the forest was covered with a deep, white blanket.

A chilly wind blew. Each of the dogs shivered, longing to be with their owner, in front of a crackling fire.

Spike started home in one direction, but Lady trotted off in another direction. The dogs could not find their way back. They could not see or smell the trail. Wind-driven snow kept stinging their furry coats, so they returned to their warm napping place. "I think we might be stuck here." Spike thought. Somehow, they had to figure out how to survive a bitterly cold night.

Spike, who was a small, quick hunting dog, knew how to dig a deep hole in the ground with his paws. With lightning speed, he dug a place where the two dogs could burrow in the dirt to stay dry and warm. Lady was a large German Shepherd. She was the strongest dog around. So she found a few dead tree limbs, dragged them to the burrow, and piled them up so they blocked the wind.

In the morning, Spike and Lady crept out of their toasty den.
